Critical signs of alcohol toxicity are hypothermia, loss of righting reflex, muscle incoordination, and miosis, and these signs are often difficult to diagnose in intoxicated subjects. During my training, I established mouse models of binge alcohol intoxication, the first of which was based on voluntary drinking of 15% alcohol in liquid diet. As a well-established mouse model of binge alcohol intoxication, we developed a new method for prolonged alcohol treatment, which mimics human binge drinking with ethanol. Our new method is a pattern of intermittent ethanol treatment, which allows the assessment of the effects of chronic as well as long-term acute ethanol treatment on neurotransmitter/receptor signaling in vivo. We found that long-term chronic ethanol treatment, despite its neuroprotective effects, disrupted the balance between excitatory and inhibitory neurotransmission. In particular, chronic ethanol treatment reduced GABA receptor-mediated currents and altered their gating (desensitization) and pharmacology. The development of these mouse models of alcohol intoxication, and the establishment of the novel and highly sensitive procedure for prolonged ethanol treatment, will be useful for studying the pathophysiology and treatment of alcohol abuse. The central hypothesis of this proposal is that chronic ethanol treatment disrupts the balance between excitatory and inhibitory neurotransmission and that this imbalance contributes to the pathophysiology of alcohol intoxication. The goal of this proposal is to study the consequences of chronic ethanol treatment on several neurotransmitter/receptor systems, using the mouse models of alcohol intoxication. Four specific aims are designed to test the following hypotheses: Aim 1: Chronic ethanol treatment reduces the density of GABAergic synapses on CA3 pyramidal neurons in hippocampal slices from binge-fed mice. Aim 2: Chronic ethanol treatment alters expression of various subunits of NMDA receptors (NMDARs) in hippocampus. Aim 3: Chronic ethanol treatment alters sensitivity of GABAergic synapses on CA3 pyramidal neurons to ethanol. Aim 4: Chronic ethanol treatment alters the membrane properties of GABAergic interneurons. To test these hypotheses, we will: i) determine the effects of chronic ethanol treatment on the density of GABAergic synapses on CA3 pyramidal neurons in ethanol-treated mice using
